EMILY PITTINOS

Torpor, Interrupted

The cold snap at last releases the ginkgo leaves, the ground gold, and before long,
it is snowing—breath seen escaping, hot.

Glare-white noon dims to blue-black. Another fantasy about the vessels flirtation can open.
I am too alone to sleep, too aware of the burden absence brings, or perhaps too unaccustomed to peace.

   Nightjars bed down in snow, take flight at the first sight of danger; I remember nights when the danger was me—strange hackles, all pricked up.

I’m hungry again, reliving the latest commotion, the rules broken. This body dragged around so the mind could take part, decide what is alluring, worthy. The snow is what does it to me, landscape a whetstone I slide against until I become the animal. I am not actually out for blood, just want the feel of it, loosed inside, its vision: I’ll have. I’ll be bad.