Her Instinct
a found poem: Virginia Woolf’s The Waves

She stands among the stealthy and assured
in a corner of the barnyard.
There is no light. Dressed as a beast—
a bird’s beak nailed to her,
speared by the sharp moment—
her face assumes a dazed futility.
She is a wild creature now.
And yet—the alarming wish to be loved.

Note: to write the poems in this series, the poet selects a paragraph of text from a Woolf novel and uses only the words from that paragraph, without repeating or adding words or editing the language for tense or any other consideration.
