Program Description

Parents in the Room for Playful EMDR with Children

Therapists may struggle to find ways to include parent figures in the phases of EMDR. This includes the safe therapeutic alliance they have built in the play therapy room, and may have ambivalence about them based on the nature of the child's trauma, the parents' own role in failing to adequately protect the child and the impairments in the parental attachment pattern which are negatively impacting the child. Despite the complexity, the literature is clear that parents (by which we also mean other caregivers including foster and adoptive parents, grandparents; even possibly extending to residential direct care workers) must be involved in therapy as a resource and for fullest benefit of trauma processing with EMDR. The goal of this session is to find ways to give parents enough structure and support to be partners with us in moving the child toward healing.

Learning Objectives

Participants will:

1. Apply an approach to developing parents as both resources and co-regulator of their child during the preparation phase through prescriptive play therapy activities.
2. Utilize a guided process to prepare parents to be storytellers for their child's EMDR processing of trauma targets using an approach that blends EMDR processing with the play therapy setting.
3. Utilize a scripted parent interview and reporting form to closely involve parents and caregivers in both the closure and re-evaluation phases of EMDR.
