Note on Need for Shareholders' Agreement

A Shareholders' Agreement, while considered necessary in arm's-length relationships, may be just as beneficial in related party shareholding situations. For example, consider the following real situations:

- The company's business is doing well but not as well as expected. Two shareholders agree to persevere believing that the business will ultimately succeed. A third wants to get out. The other 2 do not have the resources to buy him/her out and cannot afford to let him/her go as the company will fail without that expertise.
- A shareholder is consulting for a competitor, sells his/her shares to an unacceptable third party or simply decides that he/she won't bother turning up any more.
- A shareholder wants to stop working in the business and play golf. The other 2 don't have any difficulty with this, but they want to keep working and don't want the other to profit from their hard work.
- Imagine the 3 shareholders are siblings. They have not discussed any governance issues thinking that they don't need to because they understand each other and assume they would be totally committed. One sibling subsequently marries, has children and is frequently absent. The other 2, while sympathetic, cannot manage without the third or don't want the third to profit from their hard work.
- Imagine the shareholders are husband and wife, who have not discussed any governance issues because they thought that they didn't need to. After years working together, they become involved in a messy divorce.
- Imagine the company buys real estate. 2 shareholders provide all of the funds to acquire and develop the property while the 3rd has no money to contribute. After several years, the value of the property has increased substantially. The 2 who put all the money into the property are now faced with the 3rd being entitled to 1/3 of the net value of the property.

Without a shareholders' agreement there may be no way of resolving these issues without going to Court. Often, the process of preparing a governance agreement will present opportunities such as:

- determining what should happen when expectations are not met. Most people don't consider that there might even be a down side let alone what happens when it transpires;
- committing to paper what the parties real intentions are rather than relying on the subjective recollections of the stakeholders;
- highlighting different intentions rather than assuming everyone else knows exactly what you mean when you say something; and
- eliminating ambiguity and raising real possibilities which have not been considered.
