Sharon Stone Is In Her Element In Cannes

The post-Covid summer of love we were promised in 2021 never quite materialised, but early signs suggest this year could actually deliver. Glastonbury returns next month after a two year absence; celebrities are getting hitched left, right and centre; heels are back at the top of the shopping agenda, and naked dresses are everywhere. The mood can be loosely characterised as “up for it”. Up for going out, up for holidays, up for fashion, up for fun.

Nobody is embodying the vibe shift better than Sharon Stone at Cannes right now. At 64, the festival veteran has been a joyous presence on the red carpet at the Palais des Festivals in recent days, sporting an effortlessly cool pixie crop, throwing up peace signs for the paps, and, at one point, gliding into a premiere flanked by two male models with all the nonchalance of Catherine Tramell lighting up a cig.

At that particular screening, Stone also orchestrated a dress transformation to rival Zendaya at the Met Gala – not to mention a dramatic Dolce & Gabbana moment almost on a par with the head-spinning display unfolding in Portofino at the Kravis nuptials. Having swept onto the red carpet in a heavily embellished blue and white gown with a peplum skirt, the star enlisted the help of her tall, dark and handsome dates to remove the train, revealing a bodycon dress worthy of one of Hollywood’s all-time great bombshells beneath. Making it all the more perfect? The screening was of a film called Forever Young – a title that could just as easily be applied to Stone herself.

Her Dolce & Gabbana gown was revealed to be two dresses in one.

La soirée débute d'abord au gala caritatif Better World Fund, organisé dans l'hôtel JW Marriott. Ce dîner, présidé par Sharon Stone, se tenait pour récolter des fonds pour venir en aide aux Ukrainiens. L'actrice américaine refuse de faire son entrée tant que les autres convives stagnent devant le photocall. La sécurité peine à les faire avancer vers la salle principale tant les invités veulent voir de près la superstar de cinéma. Sharon Stone pointe finalement le bout de son nez, vêtue d'une longue robe bustier orange. Les photographes se battent pour capturer le meilleur cliché d'elle. Elle arrive au photocall et est rapidement rejointe par Rossy de Palma, elle-même habillée d'une courte robe en dentelle verte. «That's it», lâche l'Américaine avant de quitter le photocall et de rejoindre la salle.

Lebanese filmmaker ‘honored’ to receive prestigious award in Cannes

Directed by Australian-Lebanese filmmaker and journalist Daizy Gedeon, the documentary follows her personal and independent introspection into Lebanon’s descent into a state of turmoil over recent years.

Writing on Instagram, Gedeon said: “I am truly honored to have received the Better World Fund’s Movie That Matters Award for my film ‘Enough: Lebanon’s Darkest Hour’ at the Cannes Film Festival this week.

“This film lays bare all the insidious forces currently at work ruining my beautiful homeland, Lebanon.”

Gedeon and her family fled Lebanon in the 1970s during the country’s civil war.

The Movie That Matters Award was established in 2016 and is a rare honor handed by filmfestivals.com to moviemakers with a strong, inspiring message. Only a few flicks have received the award since its creation.

Shot over four years and across four continents, the film highlights the 2019 October revolution and the global social justice movement that was triggered among the millions of Lebanese diasporas who rallied to support their families and friends back home.

The documentary also features exclusive interviews with key political leaders such as prime minister, Saad Hariri, former justice minister, Salim Jreissati, Hezbollah minister, Muhammad Fneich, and governor of the central bank, Riad Salame.

Previous award winners and attendees at the BWF gala include Prince Albert II of Monaco, US actors Sharon Stone and Forest Whitaker, German filmmaker Wim Wenders, French explorer Jean-Michel Cousteau, and American singer Mary J. Blige.
