(November 2019) (Learn how and when to remove this template) Philip Malla Malla, a ninth grade student at New Hampshire Harrison High School. After receiving his English language test, Philip Malla blames her English teacher, Margaret Narvin. Since he can no longer try out for the track, he avoids telling his parents and acts as if he is no longer interested. The number of classroom violations is constantly growing at school. As soon as he starts singing the anthem when he had to be silent. Ms. Narvin asks him several times. After three days of such behavior it is removedAs soon as we stop, we will continue to speak to many related adults: Headmaster DR. Albert Seymour (who decidedly says that there is no guideline against singing the national anthem, but does not know the context), the director of Dr. Gertrude Doan. (Who has received a short comment on this topic), Deputy Director DR. Joseph Paley (who prevents his participation) and Ms. Narvin, who does not comment on the situation. S. Stewart, a susceptible newspaper article, quickly attracts attention to the National Press when it is reviewed by Associated Press. Philip and his controversy about "hymn singing" quickly penetrate the national media's attention; Therefore, many praise him for his patriotism and condemn the (alleged) school that tries to tame him. Meanwhile, the Harrison School District is fighting the school board with a critical election, which will have a significant impact on school finances. Since there is already a lack of financial resources, there is an urgent concern that the school could be severely affected by further budget cuts. A journalist tries to explain Ms. Narvin's story, but her article is undermined during an international crisis. In the middle of a dispute, Narvin is asked to "take a break from learning" and reluctantly agrees. Soon afterwards he recovered and leaves his sister to Florida. After using Philip as a platform, Ted Grifen is elected to the Harrison School student council. He is currently refusing to provide Harrison High School so many means that shows how disadvantage they dealt with the incident. When Philip returns to school, it is difficult for him to adapt to his doubtful awareness and he is excluded. He also learns that he was transferred from Narvin's English course. His role in the forgiveness of Mrs. Narvin and his invitations to the media tower in Harrison's community generate resentment against him. Persecuted by other studentsHe decided to transfer to the private school Washington Academy (despite his father's protests because the school's taxes would use up all of his college funds and savings). At the new school, Philip was asked to bring his classmates to sing the "National Anthem". By then, she begins to cry and admits, "I don't know the words" as she finishes the book.
