

☐

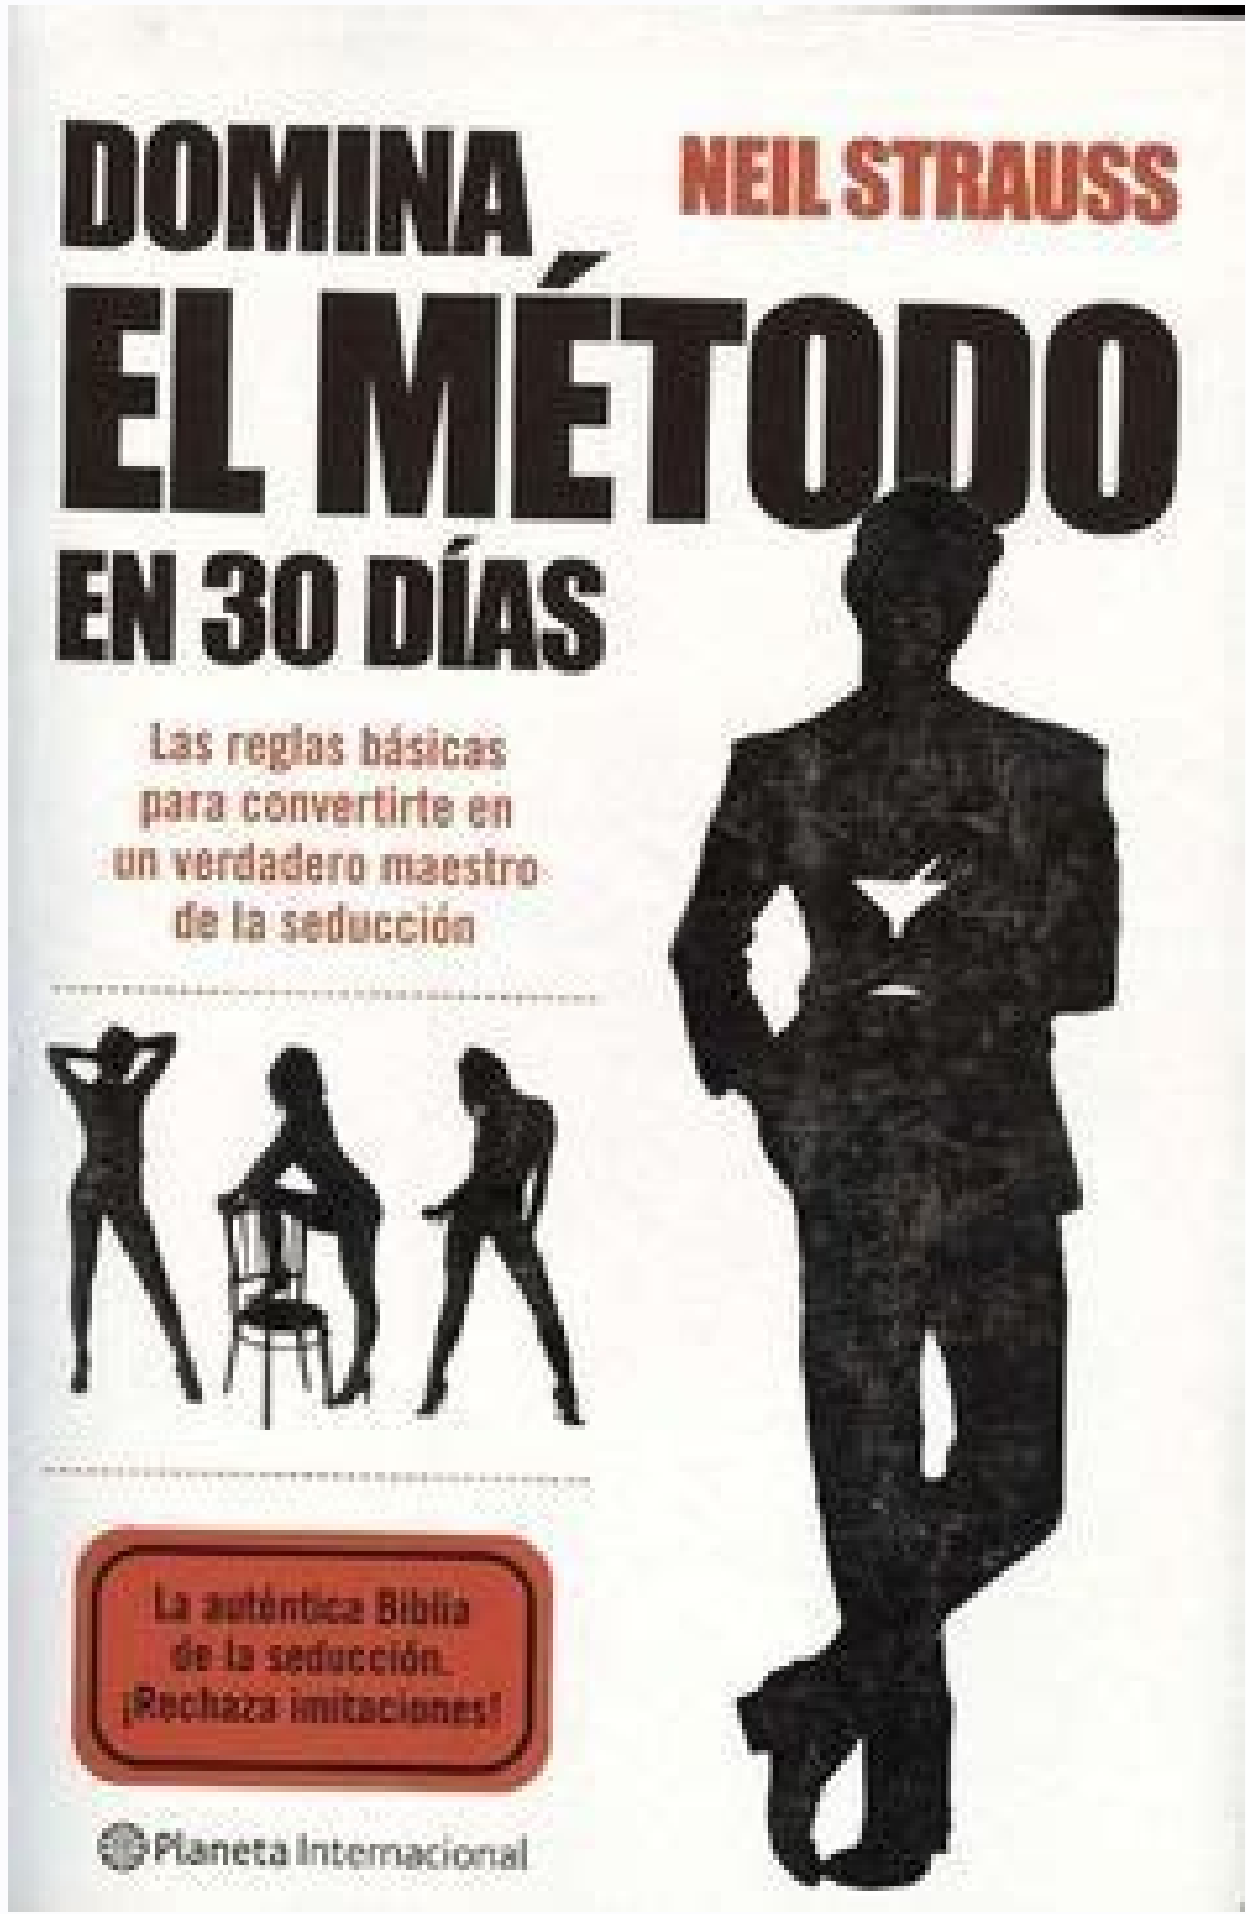

I'm not robot

reCAPTCHA

Continue

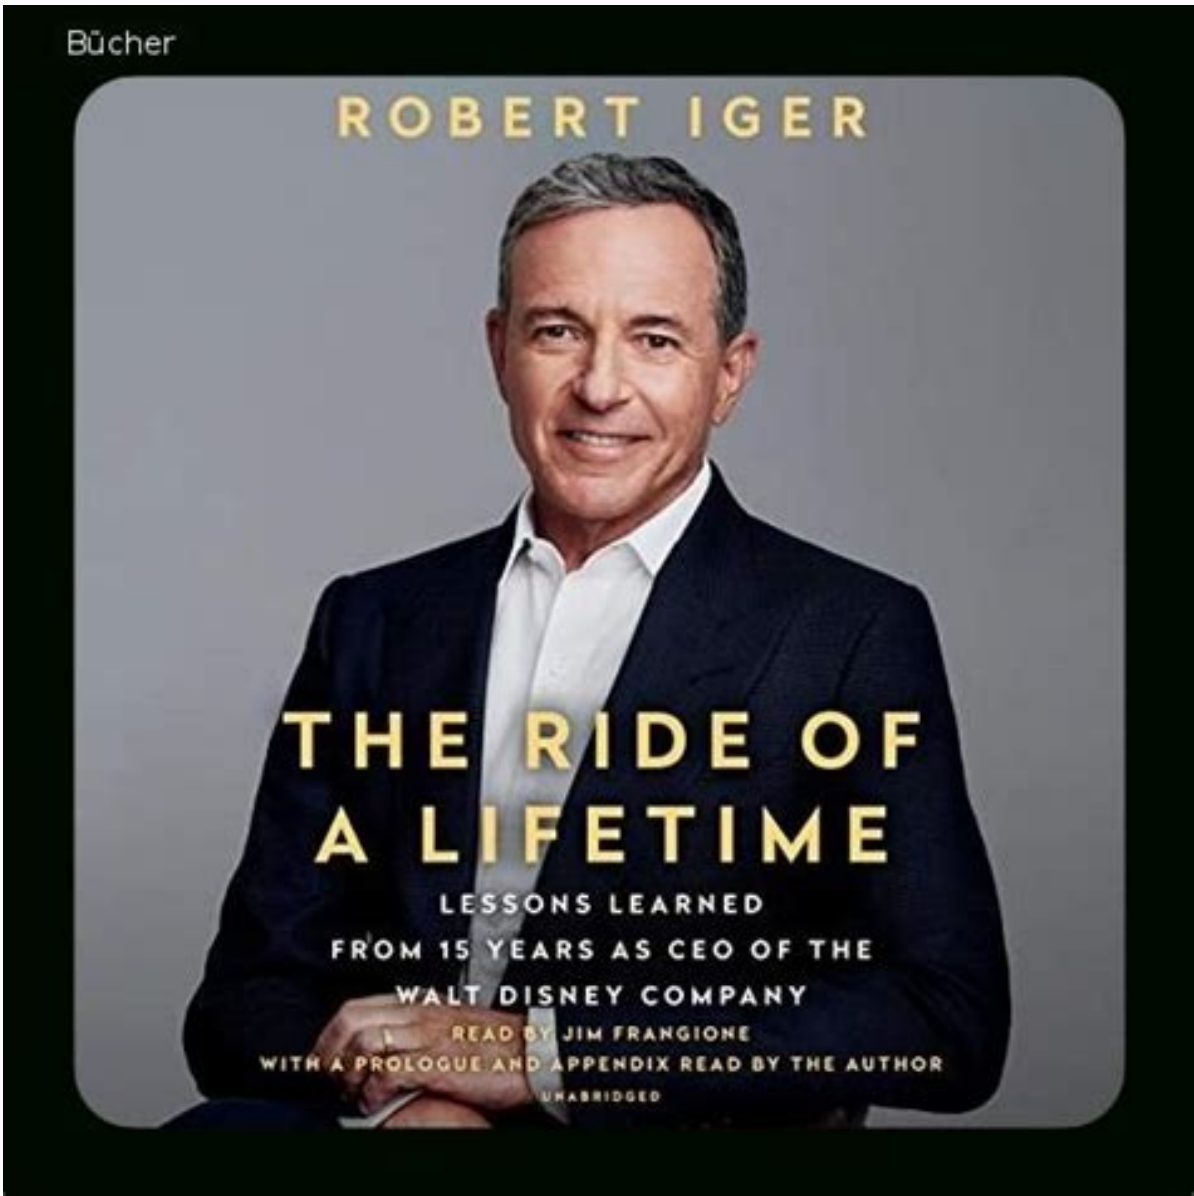

Jobs related to reading books

If reading is your great love in life, why not turn it into a side hustle and get paid to read books?

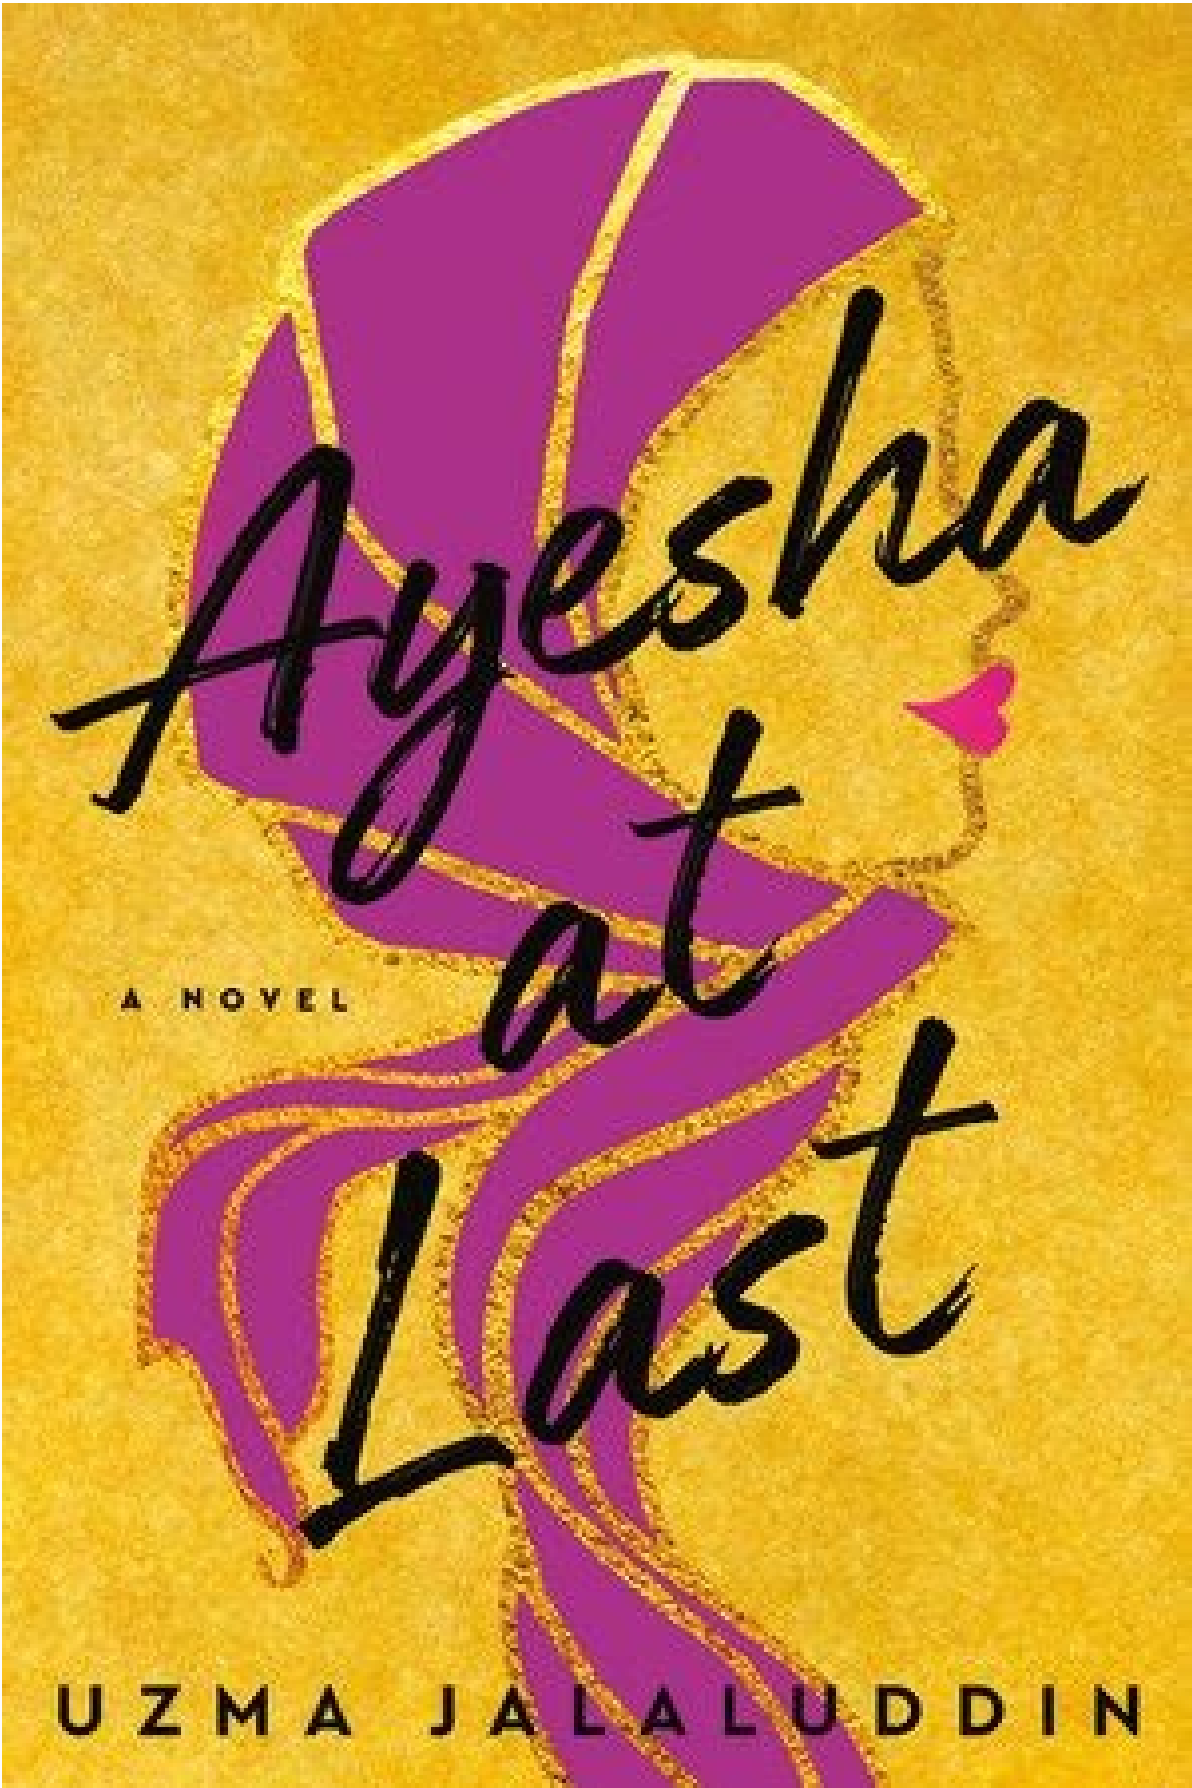

Booklist accepts freelance book reviews – assigned reviews only. Freelance opportunities are limited but pay $12.50 for a blog post and $15 for a full book review. The US Review does pay reviews, though their website does not say how much. Reviews must include a short book summary, be turned around within 2-3 weeks, and follow a style guide. Bethany House specializes in Christian books and is specifically looking for reviewers who have an existing online platform like a YouTube channel, a book blog, etc. There is no mention of compensation, but you may be able to use your affiliate marketing link within your review on your own website or channel. Writerful will allow you to submit an honest review of any book of your choosing. You just won't get paid as a new reviewer, so expect to put in some time on the site. Paid book reviewer opportunities are offered if you become a trusted, experienced reviewer. These paid opportunities compensate $10 to $50 per review. Moody Publishers is another publishing house specializing in Christian titles. They do not pay for your reviews, but you will receive free books. If you need to earn a living from your side hustle, you'll probably have to do more than review books. Here are some additional opportunities that pay more and will still have you reading. Also see: How to make money as an Amazon reviewer Audiobook narration is an industry that has been picking up steam in the work-at-home world in recent years. With so many books now being consumed through Audible and similar services, even self-publishers are publishing their works on various platforms. To become an audiobook narrator, you'll need a great voice, the ability to perform in different voices (training as a voice actor helps), and editing skills (most narrators do their own post-production file editing). You can mark up the manuscript or printed book with tips to help you avoid problems when narrating. Audiobook work also requires the right equipment, such as a microphone, a pop screen filter, good-quality headphones, a tablet or e-reader, and recording and editing software. Learn more about becoming an audiobook narrator here. Large and small publishers — not to mention websites, magazines, and corporations — often outsource online proofreading jobs as well as copy editing jobs. If you'd like to copy edit for a traditional publishing house, it will most likely require you to have a professional copy editing certificate, which you can get by completing a copy editing course. Universities often offer these courses, and many can be completed online. If you aren't able to get a certificate right now, don't worry! You can still land a professional proofreader job or copy editing position from someone else, such as a website or corporation. To apply for a copy editing or proofreading job, simply demonstrate your superior grammar and spelling skills! If you are looking at some resources, two that were helpful to me were this free workshop with the basics of getting in the proofreading business and The Copyeditor's Handbook: A Guide for Book Publishing and Corporate Communications by Amy Einsohn. (Be sure you pick up the latest edition.) With a little bit of luck, you can score an editing work-from-home job. These opportunities are not that common, but you'll periodically find websites or online publications looking for assistant editors and even managing editors. A small traditional publisher may also work with remote editors. Bookjobs.com is one great place to keep an eye out for book editor openings; you can also keep a tab on Indeed, and make it a habit to regularly check the Careers page on your favorite websites. Or you could develop your own freelance editing business, selling your services to authors seeking a professional evaluation and polish of their manuscripts. This will take some time and legwork on your part. You'll need to build your business from the ground up: decide your rates, design your website, and gather customer testimonials. Then you'll need to land clients! You may want to look for editing jobs via other services while you work on your own base of operations as a freelancer. You can find a remote editing job on various low-paying job boards (such as UpWork) or via better-paying Virtual Assistant companies (like Time Etc). This work-while-you-build strategy serves two purposes: First, it brings some money in, and second, it lets you collect testimonials about your performance. Be careful when employing this tactic, however. Make sure you don't poach customers from another service or violate the terms of your agreement with any virtual assistant platform. If you are fluent in a second language, you may find online opportunities for translation jobs. These gigs are plentiful on sites like UpWork in addition to translation services and marketplaces such as: Babelcube Today Translations Translators Base Ulatus There are a lot of emerging opportunities to work with writers who are self-publishing these books. While these folks may have a great story to share, they may not be as passionate about formatting their book or graphic design needed to create a compelling book cover. You can learn how to do book layout and editorial or graphic design for free at sites such as The Book Designer. And many great desktop publisher computer programs, such as Adobe InDesign, Quark XPress and Microsoft Publisher, can help you with the actual book layout. Then just hang out your shingle as a designer or formatter! You can create a website to advertise your book layout and design services, network with authors and publishers on social media, and look for designer gigs in all the usual places. Some smaller publishing houses even hire freelance book designers, giving you the opportunity to establish a lucrative business relationship. Or you can actively seek out self-publishing authors getting their books ready for print-on-demand and ebook stores like Kindle. (The latter will likely be your primary clientele.) This is the ultimate "get paid to read books" job. Let's say you've been building all the skills I outlined above. You've maximized your opportunities in the book business. You can recognize good writing. You're a good copy editor and overall editor. You know how to make a book look beautiful on the page and on the screen. So why not start publishing books yourself? Go into business to create your own publishing company! If you're a writer, you could start by self-publishing your own work. Once you're established as someone who can turn out a beautifully designed and cleanly edited product, you can start looking for other authors to publish. You'll need some start-up capital to land your first author, but you'll have all the skills and a golden opportunity to create a book that you believe in. And be sure both you and the author make some money, of course! One of the key tools in your arsenal is knowing how to market yourself, your skills, and your products. Not only is this crucial to making your own freelance editing or publishing business work, but you can also turn book marketing and public relations into its own business! With so many self-published authors new to the field every month and traditionally published authors who are struggling to come up with their own PR strategy, there are tons of opportunities to step in and help them out. You can become their freelance book marketing and publicity pro, who lines up blog tours, plan author interviews, and really gets the word out about their books with viral marketing. Kirkus hires book reviewers as well as several of the positions mentioned above. Freelance Writer's Den offers a job board specifically for writers and editors. Publishers Weekly offers several freelance publishing positions, such as book reviewer and editor. Are you a book lover who's excited about these opportunities? I'm excited for you! There is so much remote work for you to turn your love of reading into a livelihood, and now you know how to look for it. Whether you're reviewing books for extra cash or narrating the next best-selling audio book, I'd love to hear from you about any and all jobs you land and businesses you begin from here! If you are a bookworm and always look for opportunities to dive into reading then you should search for jobs that will satisfy your need to be around books and reading. Reading books is a hobby that relaxes your senses. If you found yourself helpless from the addiction of reading and want it to be your career then below are certain jobs for book lovers that will be of great use for you. Most jobs that require reading books also include writing assignments and related proofreading work. You can work for agencies or work as a freelancer. Jobs or Careers for Book Lovers: 1. Blogger: As a blogger you will have to specialize in a subject for which you will have to engross in extensive reading of books on that same. You will need to have in depth knowledge so reading many books particularly to cover the subject better is necessary as part of research. Owning a blog as a career may be a risky venture and you might want to work in an alternative job also. Nevertheless there are established blogs for which you can write articles. 2. Novelist: As a novelist you will have to read other books for inspiration and new ideas for your own book. It is very difficult to find success in this field so you can keep a collection of pieces of work and once you are an established author you can go for publishing all of it. You can self publish your books if you are not responded by an agent. 3. Editor: Reading is the main feature of an editor's job. Books, online publishing or magazines all need editing and proofreading as well for improvement. As a bookworm you surely can flourish.

Kirkus hires freelance reviewers and expects a 350-word review within a 2-week time frame. Booklist accepts freelance book reviews – assigned reviews only. Freelance opportunities are limited but pay $12.50 for a blog post and $15 for a full book review. The US Review does pay reviews, though their website does not say how much. Reviews must include a short book summary, be turned around within 2-3 weeks, and follow a style guide. Bethany House specializes in Christian books and is specifically looking for reviewers who have an existing online platform like a YouTube channel, a book blog, etc. There is no mention of compensation, but you may be able to use your affiliate marketing link within your review on your own website or channel. Writerful will allow you to submit an honest review of any book of your choosing. You just won't get paid as a new reviewer, so expect to put in some time on the site. Paid book reviewer opportunities are offered if you become a trusted, experienced reviewer. These paid opportunities compensate $10 to $50 per review. Moody Publishers is another publishing house specializing in Christian titles. They do not pay for your reviews, but you will receive free books. If you need to earn a living from your side hustle, you'll probably have to do more than review books. Here are some additional opportunities that pay more and will still have you reading. Also see: How to make money as an Amazon reviewer Audiobook narration is an industry that has been picking up steam in the work-at-home world in recent years.

Online Book Club requires your first review to be unpaid, but you'll still get a free book to review! After your initial review, most projects offer $5 to $60. As you can see, book reviewing really isn't a gig that compensates well for the time involved. You really need to love to read — and quickly — and consider any compensation a bonus while having fun. Kirkus hires freelance reviewers and expects a 350-word review within a 2-week time frame. Booklist accepts freelance book reviews – assigned reviews only. Freelance opportunities are limited but pay $12.50 for a blog post and $15 for a full book review. The US Review does pay reviews, though their website does not say how much. Reviews must include a short book summary, be turned around within 2-3 weeks, and follow a style guide. Bethany House specializes in Christian books and is specifically looking for reviewers who have an existing online platform like a YouTube channel, a book blog, etc. There is no mention of compensation, but you may be able to use your affiliate marketing link within your review on your own website or channel. Writerful will allow you to submit an honest review of any book of your choosing. You just won't get paid as a new reviewer, so expect to put in some time on the site. Paid book reviewer opportunities are offered if you become a trusted, experienced reviewer. These paid opportunities compensate $10 to $50 per review.

If you aren't necessarily looking to pay all your bills by reading books, you may be able to find work as a paid book reviewer or at least get a free book in exchange for an online review.

If you aren't necessarily looking to pay all your bills by reading books, you may be able to find work as a paid book reviewer or at least get a free book in exchange for an online review. Here are some sites where you can provide paid book reviews or get a new book. Online Book Club requires your first review to be unpaid, but you'll still get a free book to review! After your initial review, most projects offer $5 to $60. As you can see, book reviewing really isn't a gig that compensates well for the time involved. You really need to love to read — and quickly — and consider any compensation a bonus while having fun. Kirkus hires freelance reviewers and expects a 350-word review within a 2-week time frame. Booklist accepts freelance book reviews – assigned reviews only. Freelance opportunities are limited but pay $12.50 for a blog post and $15 for a full book review. The US Review does pay reviews, though their website does not say how much. Reviews must include a short book summary, be turned around within 2-3 weeks, and follow a style guide. Bethany House specializes in Christian books and is specifically looking for reviewers who have an existing online platform like a YouTube channel, a book blog, etc. There is no mention of compensation, but you may be able to use your affiliate marketing link within your review on your own website or channel. Writerful will allow you to submit an honest review of any book of your choosing. You just won't get paid as a new reviewer, so expect to put in some time on the site. Paid book reviewer opportunities are offered if you become a trusted, experienced reviewer. These paid opportunities compensate $10 to $50 per review. Moody Publishers is another publishing house specializing in Christian titles. They do not pay for your reviews, but you will receive free books. If you need to earn a living from your side hustle, you'll probably have to do more than review books. Here are some additional opportunities that pay more and will still have you reading. Also see: How to make money as an Amazon reviewer Audiobook narration is an industry that has been picking up steam in the work-at-home world in recent years. With so many books now being consumed through Audible and similar services, even self-publishers are publishing their works on various platforms. To become an audiobook narrator, you'll need a great voice, the ability to perform in different voices (training as a voice actor helps), and editing skills (most narrators do their own post-production file editing). You can mark up the manuscript or printed book with tips to help you avoid problems when narrating. Audiobook work also requires the right equipment, such as a microphone, a pop screen filter, good-quality headphones, a tablet or e-reader, and recording and editing software. A small traditional publisher may also work with remote editors. Bookjobs.com is one great place to keep an eye out for book editor openings; you can also keep a tab on Indeed, and make it a habit to regularly check the Careers page on your favorite websites. Or you could develop your own freelance editing business, selling your services to authors seeking a professional evaluation and polish of their manuscripts. This will take some time and legwork on your part. You'll need to build your business from the ground up: decide your rates, design your website, and gather customer testimonials. Then you'll need to land clients! You may want to look for editing jobs via other services while you work on your own base of operations as a freelancer. You can find a remote editing job on various low-paying job boards (such as UpWork) or via better-paying Virtual Assistant companies (like Time Etc). This work-while-you-build strategy serves two purposes: First, it brings some money in, and second, it lets you collect testimonials about your performance. Be careful when employing this tactic, however. Make sure you don't poach customers from another service or violate the terms of your agreement with any virtual assistant platform. If you are fluent in a second language, you may find online opportunities for translation jobs. These gigs are plentiful on sites like UpWork in addition to translation services and marketplaces such as: Babelcube Today Translations Translators Base Ulatius There are a lot of emerging opportunities to work with writers who are self-publishing these books. While these folks may have a great story to share, they may not be as passionate about formatting their book or graphic design needed to create a compelling book cover. You can learn how to do book layout and editorial or graphic design for free at sites such as The Book Designer. And many great desktop publisher computer programs, such as Adobe InDesign, Quark XPress and Microsoft Publisher, can help you with the actual book layout. Then just hang out your shingle as a designer or formatter! You can create a website to advertise your book layout and design services, network with authors and publishers on social media, and look for designer gigs in all the usual places. Some smaller publishing houses even hire freelance book designers, giving you the opportunity to establish a lucrative business relationship. Or you can actively seek out self-publishing authors getting their books ready for print-on-demand and ebook stores like Kindle. (The latter will likely be your primary clientele.) This is the ultimate "get paid to read books" job. Let's say you've been building all the skills I outlined above. You've maximized your opportunities in the book business. You can recognize good writing. You're a good copy editor and overall editor. You know how to make a book look beautiful on the page and on the screen. So why not start publishing books yourself? Go into business to create your own publishing company! If you're a writer, you could start by self-publishing your own work. Once you're established as someone who can turn out a beautifully designed and cleanly edited product, you can start looking for other authors to publish. You'll need some start-up capital to land your first author, but you'll have all the skills and a golden opportunity to create a book that you believe in. And be sure both you and the author make some money, of course! One of the key tools in your arsenal is knowing how to market yourself, your skills, and your products. Not only is this crucial to making your own freelance editing or publishing business work, but you can also turn book marketing and public relations into its own business! With so many self-published authors new to the field every month and traditionally published authors who are struggling to come up with their own PR strategy, there are tons of opportunities to step in and help them out. You become their freelance book marketing and publicity pro, who lines up blog tours, plan author interviews, and really gets the word out about their books with viral marketing. Kirkus hires book reviewers as well as several of the positions mentioned above. Freelance Writer's Den offers a job board specifically for writers and editors. Publishers Weekly offers several freelance publishing positions, such as book reviewer and editor. Are you a book lover who's excited about these opportunities? I'm excited for you! There is so much remote work for you to turn your love of reading into a livelihood, and now you know how to look for it. Whether you're reviewing books for extra cash or narrating the next best-selling audio book, I'd love to hear from you about any and all jobs you land and businesses you begin from here! If you are a bookworm and always look for opportunities to dive into reading then you should search for jobs that will satisfy your need to be around books and reading. Reading books is a hobby that relaxes your senses. If you found yourself helpless from the addiction of reading and want it to be your career then below are certain jobs for book lovers that will be of great use for you. Most jobs that require reading books also include writing assignments and related proofreading work. You can work for agencies or work as a freelancer. Jobs or Careers for Book Lovers: 1. Blogger: As a blogger you will have to specialize in a subject for which you will have to engross in extensive reading of books on that same. You will need to have in depth knowledge so reading many books particularly to cover the subject better is necessary as part of research. Owning a blog as a career may be a risky venture and you might want to work in an alternative job also. Nevertheless there are established blogs for which you can write articles. 2. Novelist: As a novelist you will have to read other books for inspiration and new ideas for your own book. It is very difficult to find success in this field so you can keep a collection of pieces of work and once you are an established author you can go for publishing all of it. You can self publish your books if you are not responded by an agent. 3. Editor: Reading is the main feature of an editor's job. Books, online publishing or magazines all need editing and proofreading as well for improvement. As a bookworm you surely can flourish. 4. English Teacher: As an English teacher or professor you will get a chance to share your passion with students. You can analyze many books and get fresh outlooks of it for the young kids. 5. Librarian: Working as a librarian is the first though any book lover would have. You may not always be reading books but you will always be around books and share your devotion of books with other like-minded people. You get to grab the latest releases and if you are collecting you will get to check the selection of books. 6. Literary agent: A literary agent is the mediator for an author and publisher. They represent writers and help with payment and contract negotiation. Very less publishing companies accept submissions without an agent. 7. Publisher: If you are a part of a publishing house you are also an element of the process of selection of award winning books for printing. Some of the tasks of publisher includes appraise manuscripts, edit it, discover apt cover design and work on marketing ways. 8. Independent book store proprietor: If you are looking forward to owning a business and want to integrate your book reading love, you can start up a small bookstore. This way you will be around books and new releases and help others with their book reading passion. 9. Working in a company that deals with books: Hunt for companies that deal with books, they need a lot of reading. There are positions where intensive reading is required and as a bookworm you will easily slot in. 10. Archivist: Archivists are accountable for collecting, arranging and preserving vital documents and other kinds of records. There are many opportunities for the written documents but some may be dull like legal contracts. But if you love reading and arranging you will fit in. 11. Reporter: As a reporter you can work for magazines, newspapers, televisions, websites or other media companies. They are mainly responsible to report news events that have impact on human society. For being credible and unambiguous a reporter has to research a lot which involves reading and gathering particulars. It may also involve writing reports which will require your skills developed by reading. There are no absolute educational requirements to become a reporter. 12. Proofreader: The job of proofreaders is to read the copy, correct and check for grammar, punctuations and spelling mistakes. Reading is the basic and fundamental element of this job. It is one of the top jobs if you seek to be paid for spending time reading the whole day. 13. Political Scientist: If you have curiosity about politics and you are enough aware about the politics then political science is your field. Political scientists have to read and research about the origins and development of political systems. The operations of these systems have to be analyzed. Different government policies have to be read and studied. Some are documented in books for book lovers. 14. Lawyer: If legal matters intrigue you then you can choose this career. Lawyers spend a great amount of time reading. Lawyers have to research and by now you are well aware that research and reading go hand in hand. If cuddling with contracts, patent records, or a thick book on legislation sounds amusing to you, then you fit in the slot. 15. Paralegal: Paralegals assist lawyers with tasks that include organizing legal documents and evidence, conducting research and maintaining reference documents. All of these works require extensive reading and interest in legal proceedings. 16. Historian: Historians are responsible for analyzing, interpretation and researching the past by examining historical documents and relics. As a historian you will get to read books, contracts, historical records, diaries and newspapers, and other similar documents so that it helps in developing the accurate depiction of human, culture, event and time. 17. Script reader: You can read a lot of scripts of films or television series etc submitted by writers for possible production. Your duty will be to check for any obscenity and put right immoral or misleading sentences. Picking the best and putting the submitted scripts through various levels of test by reading appropriately is the task of script reader. 18. Desktop Publisher: If you have designing interests with reading passion this job will be best for you. You will need graphic designing skills, along with writing, reading and editing skills. You can work for a company in-house or freelance. 19. Copywriter: Next best option for a reader is writing and as copywriter you will be given with a specific topic for which you will be needing lot of reading and research through interviews etc. Advertisement scripts and jingles, slogans to encourage people to buy a product is one of the many topics a copywriter writes on. 20. PR specialist: A public relation specialist needs to prepare press releases, information for client's media image and speeches. The PR is responsible to build and maintain positive image for their clients. The tasks requires a PR to read and research for what to say and what to not. 21. Market research analyst: If you are interested in reading facts and figures this job is appropriate for you. If you like searching through information, analyzing reports, and collecting data, you might enjoy this job. 22. Book reviewers: As a book reviewer you read books and critique them on the basis of the employer's conditions, such as the capabilities of the characters to be believed, mood, plot, setting, tone and significance. Freelancers are given one to two books and several weeks for the reviewers to read and then evaluate about it. 23. Book conservator: A book conservator is responsible to conserve and restore books, documents and manuscripts. Cultural heritage is the main activity that a book conservator involves in. Paper based items, such as books, scrapbooks, maps, post card and newspapers display distinctive apprehension when it comes to conservation and care. If you like being around historical documents and books this will be apt job for you. 24. Illustrator: You can become an illustrator by reading books and providing visual representation. The complicated concepts of novels, books, manuals etc can be clarified by illustration. This is most common for children's books. 25. Translator: A translator translates a written copy of the book into a different language. For instance if you are a native Japanese speaker who can read English and speak English fluently, you can be hired to translate an English novel into Japanese. A degree in the second language will be helpful as the translator is expected to read and rewrite the copies taking into consideration grammar rules, sentence formation, expression and word connotation. This profession brings you close to reading in two distinct languages. 26. Book publicist: Your job generally refers to promotion of the books. If you have enough media contacts you can easily turn into book publicist. You will be accountable for marketing a certain book, scheduling signing of books, connecting to major newspapers and contacting radio or television producers to advertise a book. If you are a book addict and love to spend time in dedication to books, from above list you can understand that there are jobs meant for book readers who have developed specific skills from reading that includes knowledge on writing, grammar, analytical thinking, heavy imagination skills and common knowledge, smart and creative approaches. Thus now you are aware that there are indeed plenty of job options for a book lover. All you got to do is explore more and come to a conclusion. Save