

Continue

This image showing Homer and Lisa supposedly going viral on X was actually created using AI. The "collapse of the Baltimore bridge" scene was initially convincing but upon closer inspection, it was clear that the fake image had distinct errors such as 10 spikes in Lisa's hair whereas she only has eight in real episodes. The Simpsons episode featuring a similar scene with Donald Trump didn't exist in any archives or director's cut. The date formatting and character representation in a particular instance of user feedback on social media are inconsistent, with one user mistakenly interpreting the clock as showing April 12th when it was actually March 12th. Some users have also questioned the legitimacy of the content, with one user claiming that an episode with this theme never aired on The Simpsons. With autonomous cars on the road and self-driving taxis gaining traction, the notion of a runaway vehicle has become a serious concern. According to reports, such incidents have already occurred in 2025, leaving passengers bewildered by malfunctioning systems. As autonomous vehicles continue to proliferate, the technology that once promised convenience is now being scrutinized for its potential risks. Interestingly, Elon Musk's ambitious plans for Mars colonization seem to mirror The Simpsons' prediction made in a 2015 episode. Musk aims to send humans to Mars as early as 2025, aligning with the show's forecast. Additionally, AI is rapidly transforming the global workforce, with 41% of companies planning to replace human roles with AI this year. The Simpsons has also predicted various technological advancements, including virtual reality dining and personalized medicine tailored to an individual's DNA. These predictions have sparked curiosity among viewers, who wonder if The Simpsons' satire might be a code for our future. A recent viral video claiming that The Simpsons predicted Donald Trump's death on April 12, 2025, has fueled speculation online. However, the claim has been debunked by fact-checkers and The Simpsons' creators, who revealed that it was fabricated using AI. The Simpsons' Predictions in 2025: A Cautionary Tale of Reality Blending with Satire A recent hoax on social media has raised questions about how quickly misinformation can spread and how satire can be used to blur the line between fact and fantasy, especially in today's digital landscape. The Simpsons, a long-running animated comedy series, is often credited with making predictions about global events that seem eerily accurate. One prediction that has been circulating online is the claim that The Simpsons foresaw the president's death in 2025. While the show has a history of accurate predictions, such as Donald Trump's election and Disney's acquisition of 20th Century Fox, these claims are often met with skepticism. In Season 16, Episode 19, titled "Thank God It's Doomsday", Marge gets a haircut that goes awry when Bart and Lisa leave the salon with half-shaved heads. The episode depicts Homer running into a movie theatre where he watches a film about the Rapture and later pleads with God to save his family in heaven. Many believe this is a prediction for 2025, despite its seeming implausibility. Another prediction is World War Three, which has been mentioned throughout the series. In Season 6 Episode 19, "Lisa's Wedding", Lisa's British fiancé visits Moe's Tavern in the future and mentions that Americans saved their "ae" in WW3. While these predictions are often dismissed as coincidences, they still leave audiences wondering if there is any truth to them. Ultimately, The Simpsons' predictions serve as a reminder of how easily reality can become distorted in our digital age. As we continue to navigate the complexities of the world, it's essential to approach such claims with a critical eye and separate fact from fiction. Many are curious about the connection between this phenomenon and whether it's true. Here's what we know. A viral post circulating online claims that The Simpsons predicted Donald Trump would die on April 12, 2025. The scene in question appears to show a Simpson-ified version of Trump lying in a casket surrounded by mourners along with a timestamp. However, this scene is not from an actual episode of the show. Executive producer Matt Selman has confirmed that there are no scenes on the series that predict Donald Trump's death and never have been. Instead, this video was generated using AI technology, which can now produce convincing copies of other art styles. This claim is just one of many fake predictions circulating online since at least 2017, perhaps coinciding with Trump's first presidential win. Despite the increasing believability of these fakes, they are still just false claims spreading misinformation on the internet. The Simpsons has created a viral video clip that appears to predict President Donald Trump's death on April 12, 2025. However, the show's executive producer Matt Selman has denied that the scene was ever part of an episode, calling it a falsified clip. This is not the first time The Simpsons has been associated with predicting Trump's death, as similar clips have emerged on social media since 2017 and were later found to be false. The Simpsons, a satirical sitcom set in the fictional town of Springfield, uses a situational comedy format to parody modern society, Western culture, television, and the human condition. The show's animation allows for a broader scope than traditional sitcoms, exploring issues such as environmental concerns and education through its characters' daily lives. The town's various TV channels enable jokes about the entertainment industry and press. Despite being misinterpreted in recent years due to manipulated images and social media, The Simpsons has accurately predicted several events, including Donald Trump's presidency. Only a person with a high IQ can quickly count circles, while prostate cancer has subtle symptoms that may be mistaken for other issues. Rajeev accuses his ex-wife Charu of manipulating their daughter Ziana against him, and Puja Banerjee and Kunal Verma lose their savings in a financial scam, saying they've been left with nothing. Some foods can stabilize blood sugar levels naturally when consumed on an empty stomach. Vegetarian options with more protein than eggs include certain plant-based foods. Prostate cancer is often overlooked by men over 40, but it's essential to address the issue. The article then discusses various lifestyle videos and diabetes-related content, including the launch of a new diabetes drug in India called Mounjaro. It also touches on hair growth, biotin sources, and natural ways to control hair fall. The rest of the article features spiritual and self-help content, including discussions about forgiveness, liberation, and inner peace. In the final section, the article mentions the popular TV show The Simpsons, which has been accurately predicting future events for years. The show's writers seamlessly integrate predictions into the plotlines, often as side notes or subtle hints that reward close attention. The Simpsons Season 36 has predicted a future where AI-generated content is becoming increasingly common, with one episode featuring an entirely machine-written plot that receives critical acclaim and even gets a red-carpet rollout. Another prediction suggests that prestige TV will be replaced by hyper-reels of just two minutes each, filled with explosions and life advice. In addition, the show foresees underground recipe-smuggling rings emerging in response to viral cooking shows revealing secret recipes, which is not far-fetched given people's obsession with exclusive food experiences. Furthermore, the series envisions a future where Lisa Simpson becomes the overworked head of the WNBA, continuing her character's trajectory of ambition. Lastly, it predicts that adult survival tourism will become a trend, with Springfieldians even selling "accidental" helicopter crashes as an emotional reset experience for professionals. These predictions, ranging from AI-generated content to underground recipe-smuggling rings and adult survival tourism, demonstrate The Simpsons' knack for eerily anticipating the future while incorporating humor and satire. By presenting these visions in a way that is both absurd and familiar, the show highlights the strange consequences of our current trends and obsessions. Etsy wellness retreat is just a trend, but the commodification of suffering exists in "adventure therapy" and digital detox camps. The Simpsons takes it to the next level with a theme park called Treehouse of Horror. Gen Z urban migration hits the arts scene as young creatives leave quiet suburbs for louder cities in search of meaning or decent falafel.